

Known as The Zebra, he was a well identified as an NBA referee. Glasses, a handlebar mustache, and balding, he looked the part. He worked many high profile, televised games and also worked the playoffs occasionally. He was well paid by the NBA, but he wasn't paid enough to afford the classy mansion that he resided in, or the expensive foreign sports cars that he drove.

He was around famous athletes all the time, on the court, in the locker rooms, at charity or special events, and at NBA league meetings. But nobody knew much about his personal life. Was he married? Did he have kids? Where was he raised?

While those questions did go unasked, there was one question that was asked a lot behind his back: How did The Zebra make so much money to afford nicer accessories than most players? Nobody could answer that question, except for a very select few. The reason being that, The Zebra, was a spy.