Guerrilla Teaching Second Part:

Since my brother was completely uninterested in learning about my topic, which amazed me honestly, I had to resort to torturing my parents. It was surprising to learn how much my parents knew about the Norman Invasion before I began my presentation. I asked simply, "So is there anything either of you can recall about the Norman Invasion?" As my parents began to spout off random facts, I wondered if I could actually teach them anything. They knew a respectable amount of information, the approximate date, the background of William the Conqueror, and reasons for the battle. Fortunately, they knew nothing about the Bayeaux Tapestry.

The time restraint, my parents had to go grocery shopping, made it difficult to make a smooth run through. As I progressed, there weren't any questions but my parents made several comments on how to improve my power point. Soon after completion, when I asked if they any questions, they responded no. Curious as to whether or not my parents had actually listened or had simply ignored me I asked each of them a few questions. It turns out; they listened so well that they could recall every detail. I was utterly amused.
